Von Mary Carmen : Frances (English Edition) before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Frances (English Edition):

Unlike anything else I have read Von Meks Librarian "Frances" by Mary Carmen is the fictional autobiography of Frances Myllar, written from her hospital bed in the year 2040. By and by, the reader learns some of the things that have happened in the decades between now and 2040: there has been another world war, with all its political and economical consequences, and climatic changes mean that people dress different from the way we do now. While the story unfolds, one can not help wondering how come Frances allowed her life to be completely ruled by others and not once decides anything for herself. Instead, she goes about all her manifold duties and tasks with not a word of complaint. Everything she does is a success, and there is not one single thing that could be considered a failure. Even her "romance" does not sound romantic at all; the (few) "steamy" scenes are extremely clinical, like describing sex between Barbie and Ken. Her feelings are as good as non-existent, or at least they never become apparent to me. There is no humour, everything sounds technical and perfect. Frances and everyone else in the book appear therefore rather flat, not like people of flesh and blood. I can not relate to her at all, and wonder if it's just me, or others who have read the book feel the same. Now that I am putting my impression into words, I begin to think that maybe this technical perfection is exactly what the author meant to convey. If this was her intention, she has succeeded very well.
