this story is set in the mediaeval period, a world of Knights and castles and danger. Diana Winslow is a rather unusual young lady, one who has trained in fighting with daggers and who has become part of a group of mysterious fighters who try to right wrongs. When she finds herself defending a serving woman from the attentions of a lecherous viscount her life takes a whole new path as she escapes a murder charge with the viscount's brother potentially taking the blame. Six years later the new viscount, Tom Bannaster, comes to the Keep where Diana and her sister Cicely live. He is supposedly there to get to know Cicely before proposing marriage to her but Diana wants to keep him away from her sister because of Diana's history with him. However things don't exactly go her way and Tom tries to seduce Diana. Diana has to decide where her loyalties lie, whether to the mysterious group of Bladesmen or to this man with a chequered history. This was a reasonable story set in an inhospitable and dangerous time. Tom and Diana were both appealing characters although some of the other people in the story, such as Cecily and their brother Archie, felt rather stereotypical. We didn't learn a great deal about life in the mediaeval period, most of the attention was on the interactions between Tom and Diana. The story was fairly predictable as it moved along but it wasn't boring and despite the improbability of many of the actions and events it was a reasonable read. Synopsis Diana Winslow, trained in knightly skills, becomes the first Bladeswoman in the League of the Blade. In only her second assignment, she kills a lecherous viscount in self-defense and escapes undetected - but the victim's brother, Thomas, becomes the new Viscount Bannaster and the suspect in the murder. Several years later, the League sends a message to Diana assigning her to find out for the king if Tom can be trusted.
